Han migration

- From 1950’s to 1970’s Chinese government’s policy was a centrally planned and balanced economic growth. This led to Han immigration to the region.
- From 1950 to 1970 Han population has increased from 7% to 40%.
- Chinese ethnicity is densely populated around Urumqi and other large cities. The rural parts are still mostly Turkic.
Agricultural workers make up 50% of the people of the region. 75% of the agricultural workers are of ethnic minorities.

Shamanism was the prominent religion in the region.

Buddhism dominated the region. Islam came quite late (starting of 11th century).

Uygurs are Sunni Muslims for the school of hanafi.

The religious and cultural Center of the Uygur is Kashgar.

Relatively liberal Muslims.

Movement of independence increases religious sentiments.

Some cultural standards to know

- Handshake is common if you meet somebody.
- Men and women do not touch each other.
- Eating while walking is a poor manner.
- Visitors are always welcome with teas.
- It is rude not to touch your food if you are offered.
A Yurt is a portable felt dwelling structure (like tent) used traditionally by nomads in the steppes of Central Asia. It means home, or homeland in Turkish.

dwellings

- Traditional Uyghur house is made from dried mud.
- The roofs are flat. People sleep on the roofs on very warm weathers.
- Mostly single-story houses with a living room opening to street.
language

- Uyghur belongs to Turkic branch of Ural-Altaic family of languages. It is almost identical to the languages of Turkish, Azeri, Uzbek, Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Turkmen, Tartar, Bashkurt, Chuvash, Yakut and other Turkic dialects.
- The alphabet is some sort of Arabic.

Music
Dutar/dotar

- a long-necked plucked lute with two nylon (formerly silk) strings tuned a fifth or sometimes a fourth apart, with seventeen chromatic frets. The dutar is beautifully decorated, like all Uyghur lutes, with settings in horn or bone. It is used to accompany folksongs, and as a supporting instrument in the muqam. A dutar can be found in almost every Uyghur home, and is the sole instrument which Uyghur women have traditionally played. It is played glissando, mainly on the upper string but with some heterophony from the thumb on the lower string.
Rawap

- Rawap is the most popular instrument among the Uighur instruments
- It has a banjo type sound.
Tanbir/Tambur

The word tambur comes from the Arabic ‘tunbur,’ and it is widely believed that this comes from the Sumerian word ‘pantur,’ a semispherical stringed instrument with a long stem. Another view is that it comes from the words (tabla, tabl, tabıl, tabul etc.) for percussion instruments that have been used since the very earliest times. There is mention in the Hittite civilisation of a stringed instrument called a ‘TIBULA.’ It is generally agreed that this was in all probability a long-stemmed stringed instrument. Texts from those times reveal that it was used to accompany the spoken word and dancing.

Khushtar

The Khushtar's beautiful form and resonate sound has made it a mainstay of Uyghur Orchestras. In recent years, it has also gained in popularity among mainstream Chinese as well as with many westerners.

The Khushtar is named for the carved bird that is placed on top of the handle. Khush means bird, and tar means strings. The sound of a Khushtar is very clear and resonate, reminiscent of a birdsong.

The Khushtar evolved, in ancient Kashgar, from the venerable Ghiyek instrument, taking on the lower tones as its specialty. In ancient times, during the heyday of the Silk Road, the Khushtar was called the Ashtar.

Amazingly, this musical instrument was actually lost for some generations. However, after meticulous research, the Khushtar has been brought back to the forefront and is crafted once again according to tradition.
